For formative evaluation of teaching, it is essential to consider the students' perception of teaching. The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of unit order in a physical education class on the perception of students. Subjects were freshmen (N = 126) enrolled in a university general physical education course. The course unit order was arranged thus: badminton, volleyball, and basketball. At the end of the course, the students described their thoughts. We analyzed the documented responses via text mining. Results showed that unit order and also properties of units which were arranged for freshman affected students' perception progressively.
